Stem Cell Tourism

En Español

International stem cell clinics advertise cures—for a price. Understand the concerns over stem cell tourism and what CIRM is doing to bring real cures to patients who need them.

What is stem cell tourism?

International (and even domestic) clinics have begun advertising unproven therapies at great cost to the patient and at great profit to the clinic—this is what’s referred to as stem cell tourism. But a closer look will often reveal no information about what type of stem cells are being offered. These sites also rely heavily on video testimonials from people soon after the stem cell injections, but little information about how those people fared long-term.

How have organizations such as CIRM increased awareness for stem cell tourism?

At the 2010 meeting of the International Society for Stem Cell Research in San Francisco, CIRM co-hosted a panel in which the world’s top experts discussed the steps leading to a stem cell therapy, and concerns about stem cell tourism.

At that panel, the ISSCR previewed their new web site designed to help patients and their families assess international clinics advertising stem cell cures.

CIRM is also one of 13 organizations who issued a joint advisory on stem cell tourism, which addresses questions about how to identify regulated stem cell clinical trials. You can read that advisory here.
